DECISIONS OF THE HIGH COURT. Poetry. OCTOBER TERM, 1860. EPORTED EXPRESSELY FOR THE SASTERN CLASION.]

The Horse of Hoousan. Thamas McRaney, et. al. BY THOMAS THE RUYMER. John Coulter President, &c. ) Son of the night, my noble stood, Thou are of a hoble broad. Arching neck, and step of pride. Multing eye, and glossy cost, Body round, and heaving throat. Pointed cars, and ample chest, High the star upon the crest. Foreboad broad, and flat, and high, Slender leg, and sinewy thigh.

Hoof, well-opened, smooth, and round, Bushy tall that sweeps the ground. Massive shoulder, waving mane, All denote thy royal strain. Onward darting like the wind, Soon our foes we leave behind. I distriount me at the door. From thy back the saddle shake-From thy lips the bridle take. When the burly-cakes I deal-Mine and thine slike the meal. With my little children bred, Sharing both our food and bed, Tis our honor, sable steeed,

For thou art of royal breed. ----Memory's Bells. ' When sunset dashes all the sky With purple glories heavenly fair, And from each spire and minaret There floats the sunset call to prayer-

We bend our heads with reverent hearts, While on the evening air there swells, With music we alone one hear, The softened chimes of memory's bells Over the mystic bridge, which span-The gulf between Now and Then, Our footsteps burry till we stand In childhood's consecrated glen.

and then we breathe the sacred air, Which four from unseen censors, swung By watchful phantoms, who keep guard Where memory's pearly gates are hung And then with hurrying thoughts we glide Through the dim years which fill the scroll Retouching every faded line, And shedding love light o'er the whole.

The path by human footsteps tred, Forget the way which leads us up To the pure dwelling of our God ! Or shall we hear, in the loud chants Of morning star that ever smalls Through the Eternal City's streets, The seftened chime of reemery's bells?
